testimony, and he contended, upon the authority of the treaty with Japan, that this act was a direct breach of the usages of war as recognized among civilized nations. The reflection of cases in which similar acts had been denounced. He examined the nature of the demands made upon the treaty, and argued that in the early part of our treaty with Japan, a "civilized and interesting people, we ought to have acted with the greatest possible forbearance, instead of enjoining a severity upon them which was entirely unbecomingly, and which must have inflicted intense suffering upon the inhabitants of Kagoshima. The nation was accordingly Mr. Buxton, who asserted that he considered a want of moderation and of respect for the feelings of the natives evinced by the foreign merchants in Japan, and the arrogant spirit shown by the British residents. Mr. Buxton, he observed, had exempted Lord Russell from blame in the horrible outrage, but the arrogant spirit shown by the British residents. Lord Russell, he justified the act, and upon the indefensible grounds.

Mr. Levermore moved, as an amendment to the resolution, the omission of the words "withholding" implying to Admiral Kuper a misconception of the duty imposed on him. He denied that there was any misconception of his orders on the part of Admiral Kuper, or that the slightest blame was attributable to him. On the contrary, he contended that Admiral Kuper had only obeyed the orders he had received from his superiors, and that he was bound to obey, and had executed them in their letter and in their spirit, though he had no doubt they were repugnant to the feelings of the British residents. He contended that the resolution, as it stood, implied that Admiral Kuper had been most unjustly treated by the Government.
